Shadowgarde Field Trip

The Simulation Dome fell silent after the Lava Leviathan shattered.

Harmless obsidian fragments scattered across the floor.

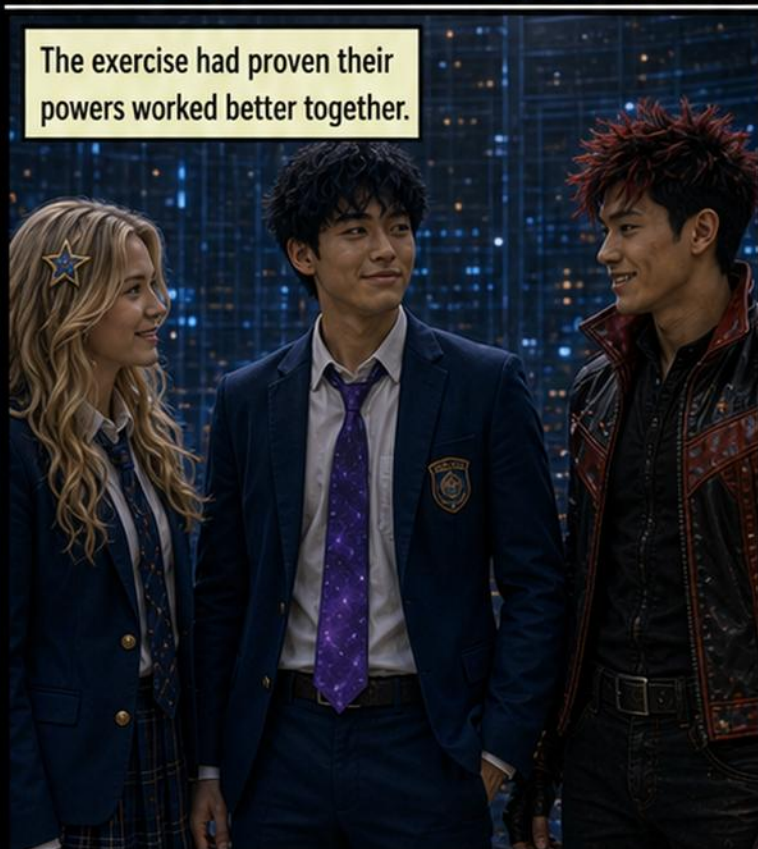

The system recorded Jack, Aurora, and Blaze as the Reality Breakers.

Jack rose with his new teammates beside him.

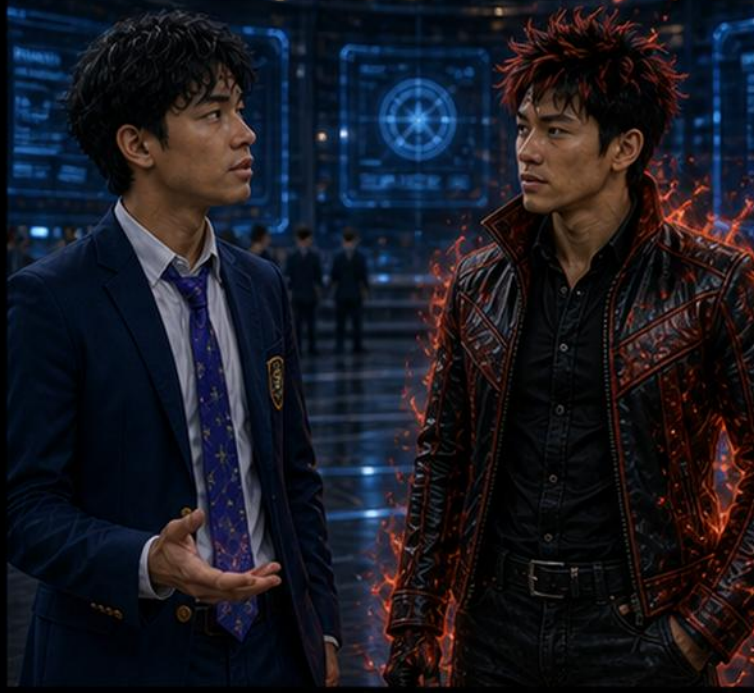

The exercise had proven their powers worked better together.

With the battle over, Jack wondered what came next.

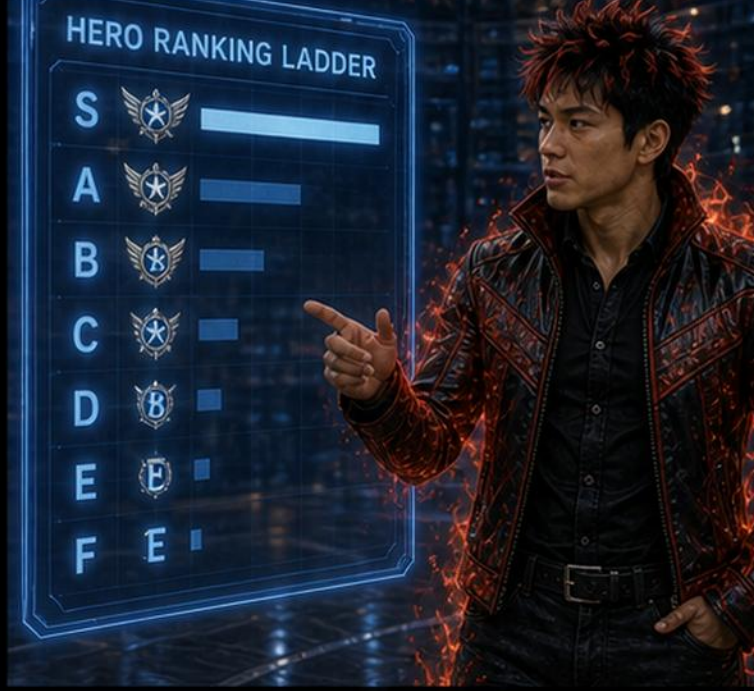

Jack asked whether students ever left training for real missions.

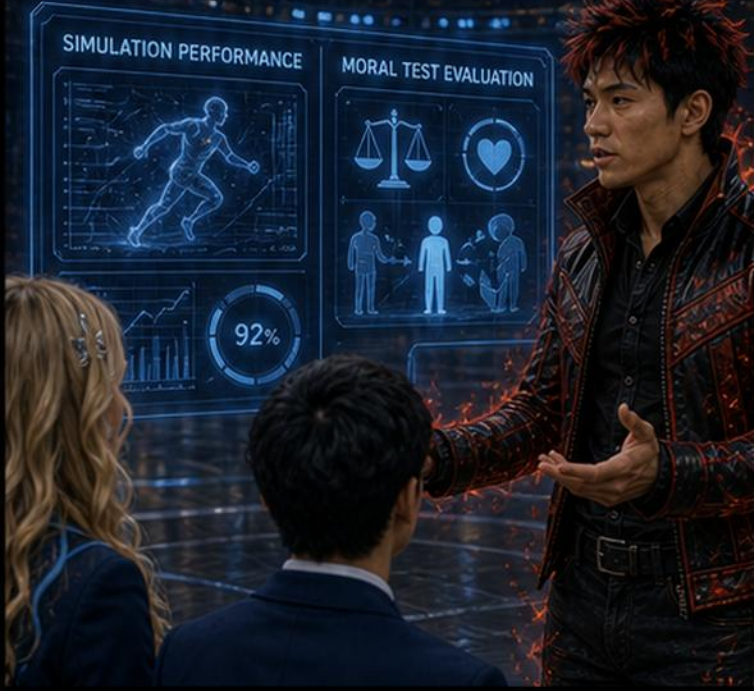

Blaze called those assignments Field Trips.

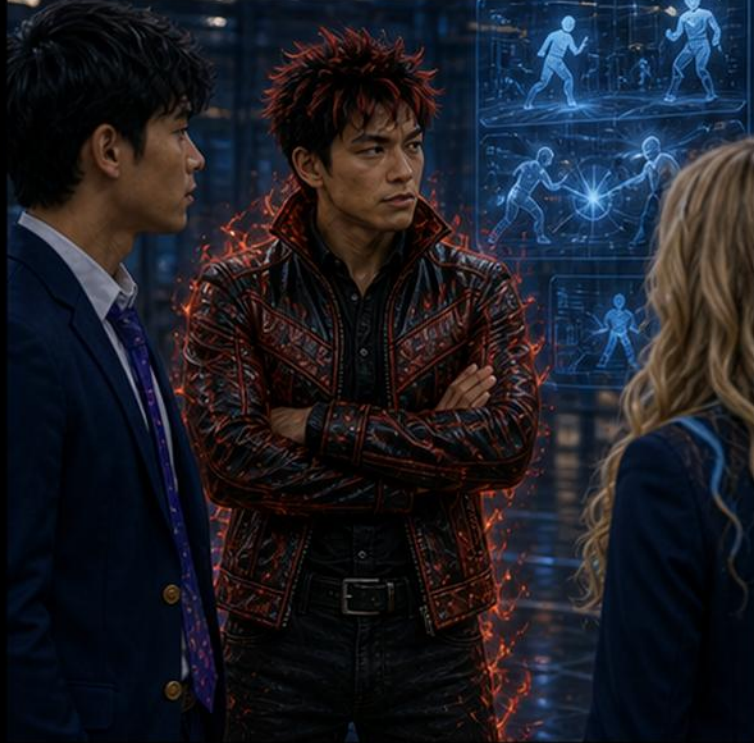

Only high-ranked students usually earned them.

Rankings came from simulations and moral tests.

Power alone was never enough.

Aurora added that every public choice shaped a future hero.

The ranking system sounded difficult.

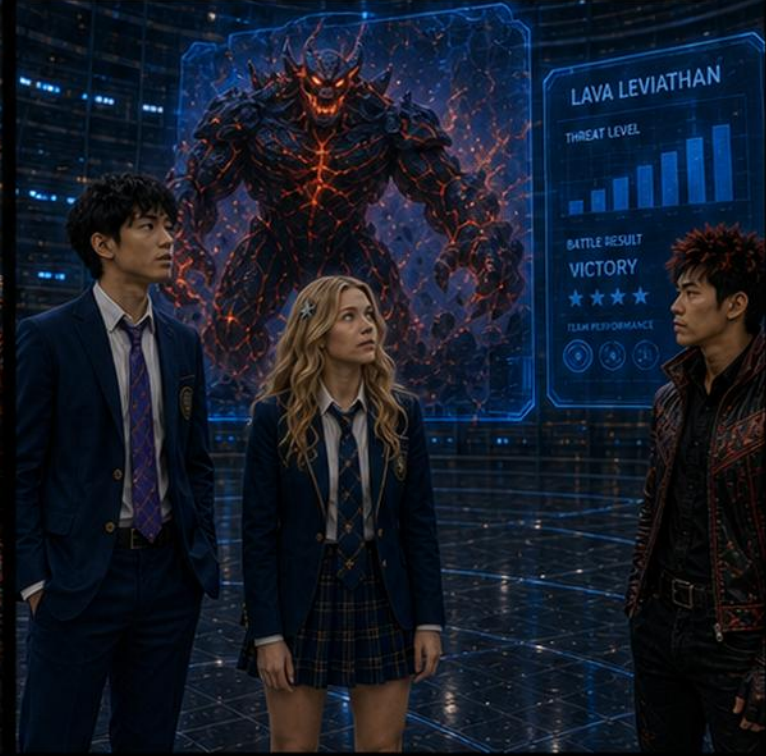

That only made Jack more interested.

Real missions would give their adventures meaning.

The Lava Leviathan had been a strong second issue.

But a simulation still had safety rails.

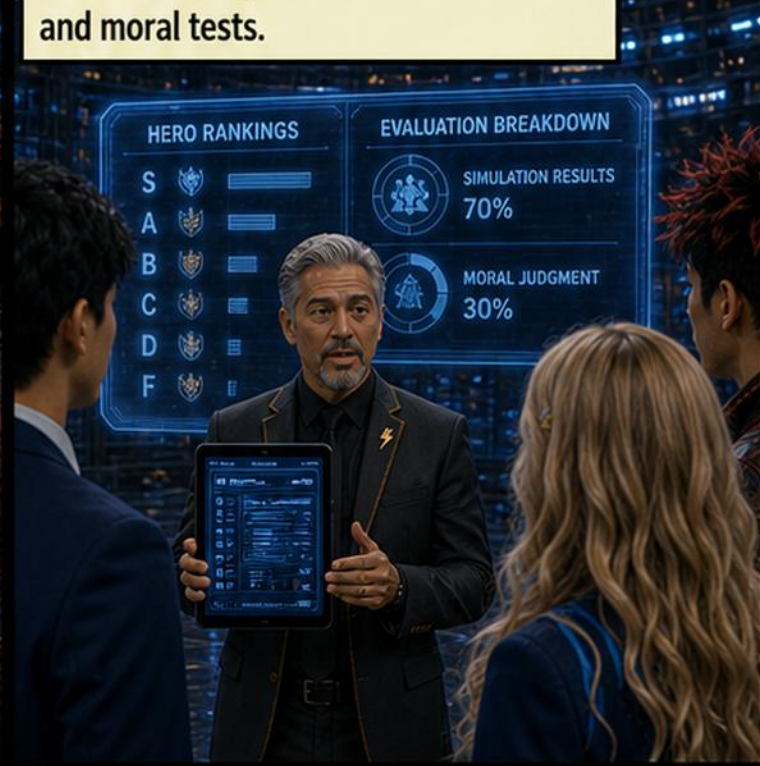

Then Professor Lightman entered with a datapad.

Professor Lightman praised their teamwork.

He said rankings measured simulations and moral tests.

A powerful student could still fail through selfish judgment.

Respected heroes needed strength and character.

Then he offered something unusual.

The Reality Breakers had earned a real Field Trip mission.

Lightman led them through Power Academy's halls.

Their destination was Shadowgarde, the dark sister academy.

A student there had unstable gravity powers.

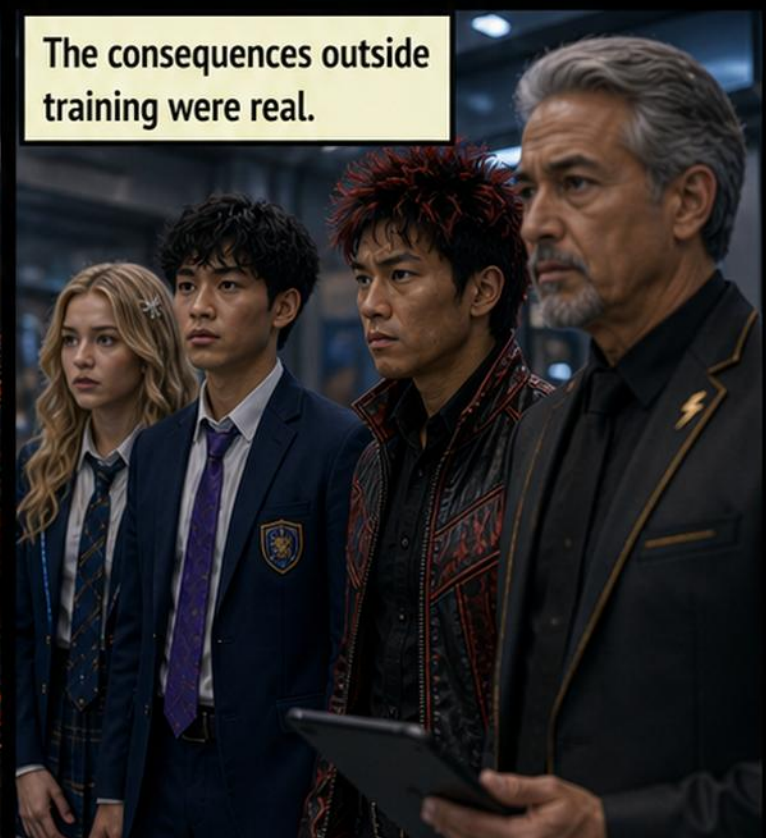

Parts of the city were already coming apart.

The assignment was small only by hero standards.

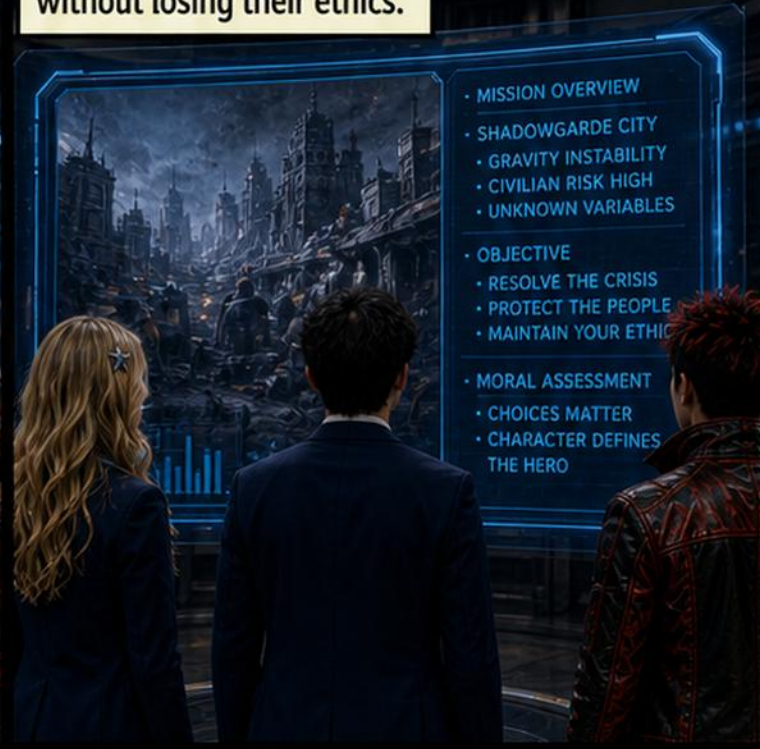

The consequences outside training were real.

Jack saw the mission was a living moral test.

They had to stop the crisis without losing their ethics.

He accepted with Blaze and Aurora beside him.

Aurora's playfulness sharpened into focus.

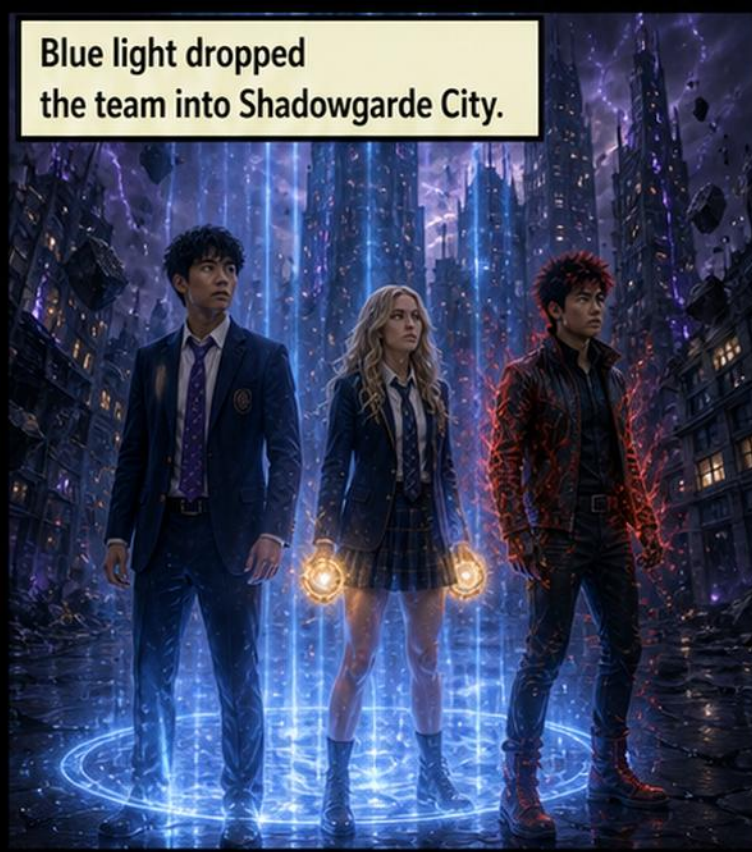

Blaze shifted straight into planning mode.

Blue light rose as their first true mission began.

Blue light dropped the team into Shadowgarde City.

Obsidian towers cut through violet stormlight.

Gravity twisted streets and debris.

A rogue student hovered above the chaos.

Jack studied the warped battlefield.

A chunk of pavement
tore free in front of them.
