Gravity Redemption

The Reality Breakers arrived as the street tore open.

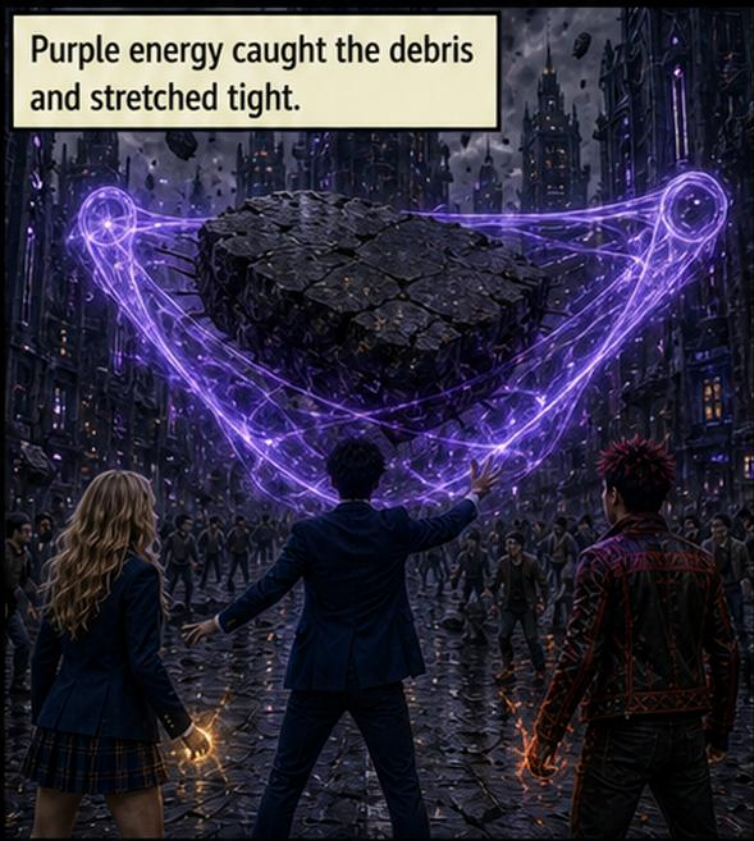

A massive slab of pavement flew toward them.

Jack summoned a giant cosmic slingshot.

Purple energy caught the debris and stretched tight.

The slab snapped back across the warped air.

The first Field Trip had become a real crisis.

Jack made the civilians the first priority.

Aurora raised radiant sunlight shields around them.

Warped debris rained against the glowing domes.

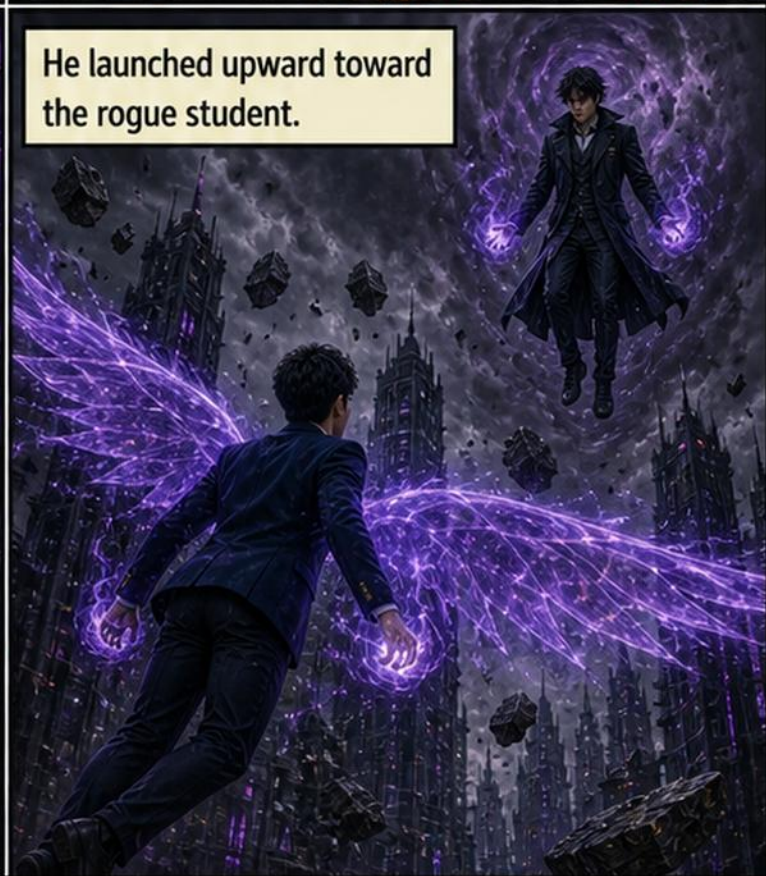

Blaze stood guard beside her.

Jack formed cosmic wings from purple light.

He launched upward toward the rogue student.

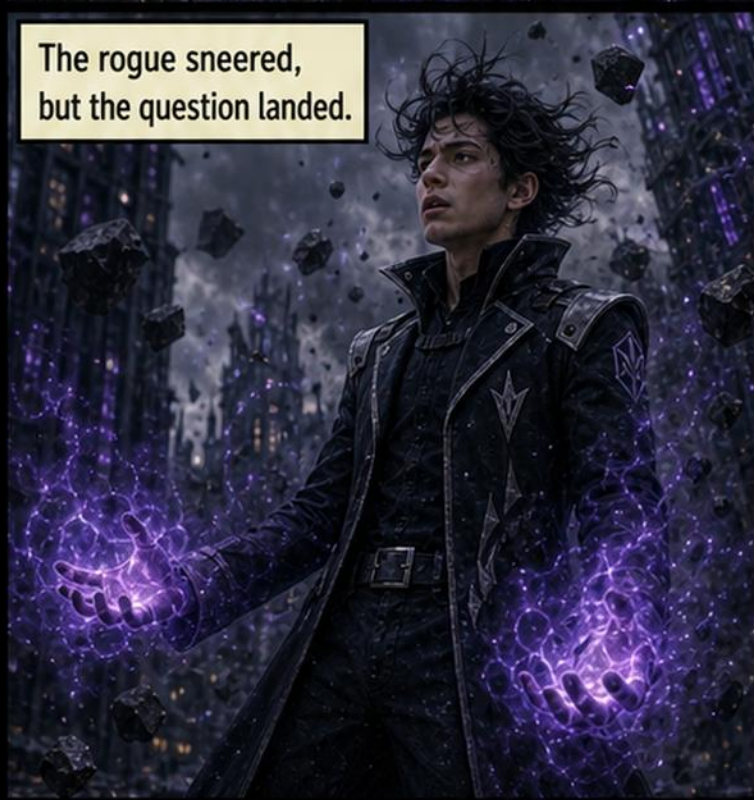

Jack did not start with an attack.

He asked why Shadowgarde had not stopped this already.

The rogue sneered, but the question landed.

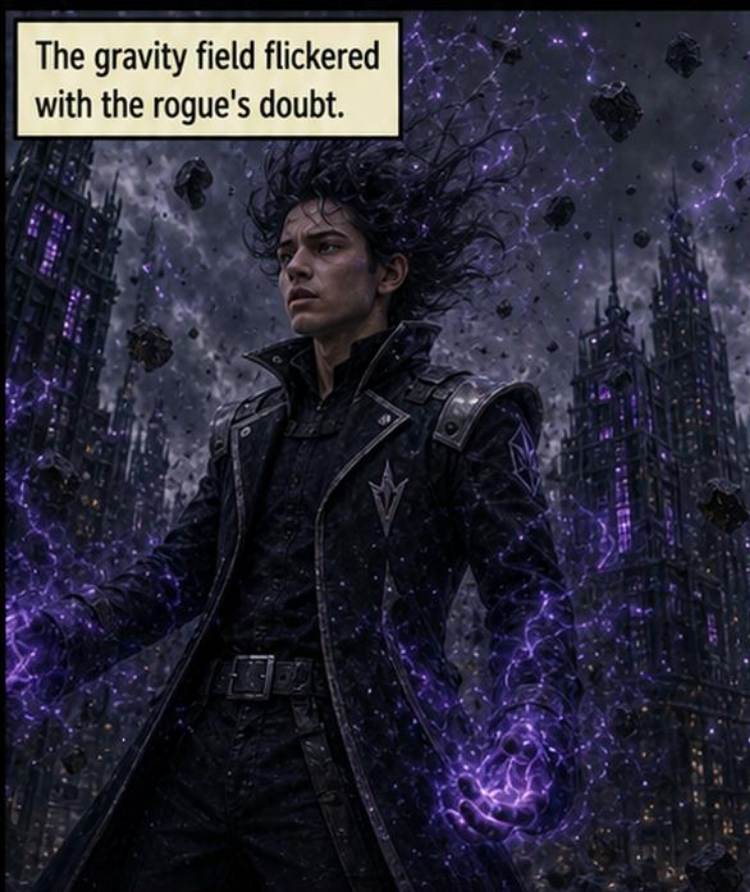

Jack said another academy arriving first made no sense.

Below them, Aurora's shields strained.

The gravity field flickered with the rogue's doubt.

Jack said trust would not look like isolation.

The rogue insisted Shadowgarde trusted him.

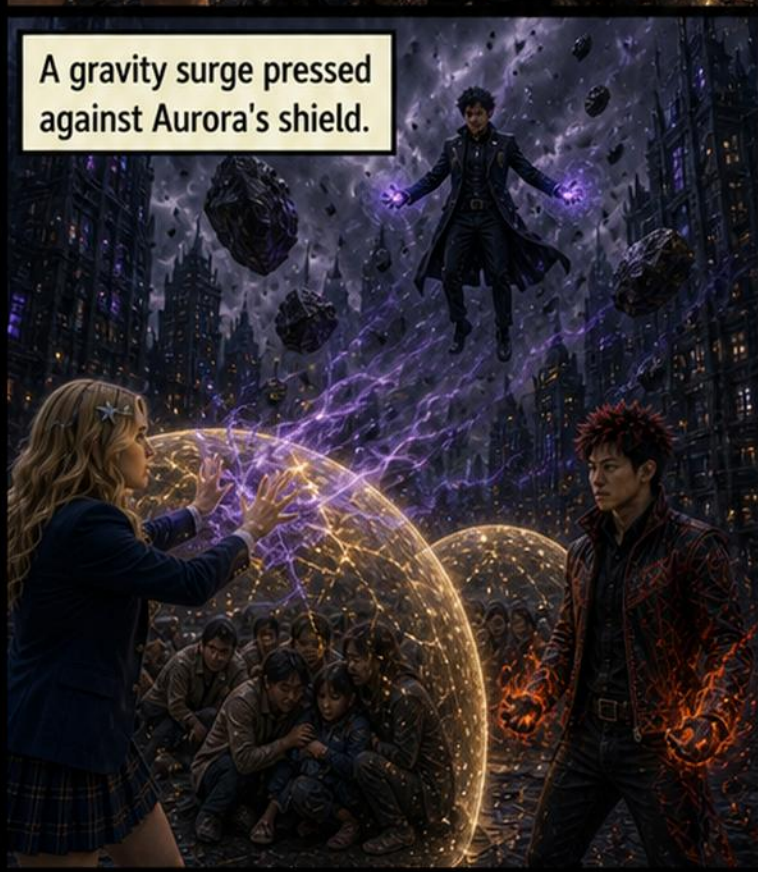

Aurora called it a test of innocent lives.

The words hit harder than expected.

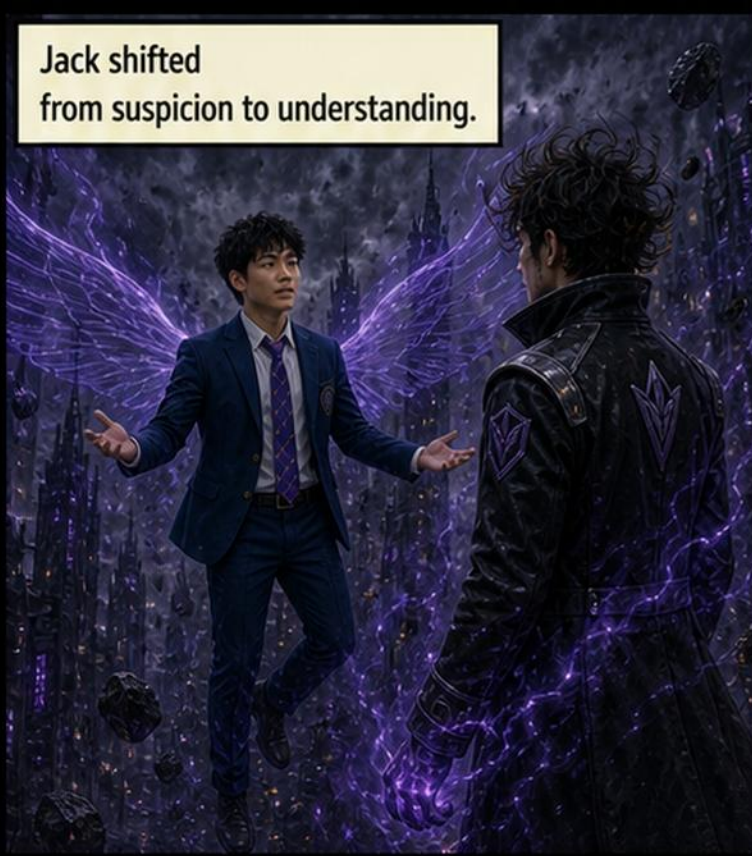

A gravity surge pressed against Aurora's shield.

The cracked barrier turned the mission desperate.

Jack shifted from suspicion to understanding.

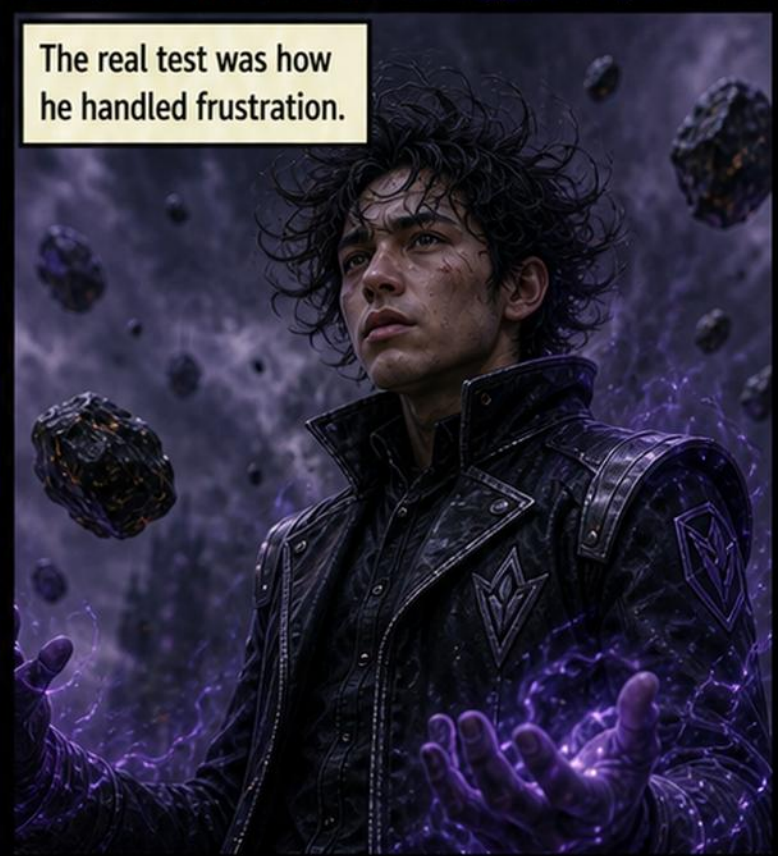

Rankings measured control and moral judgment.

Gravity power was never the rogue's weakness.

The real test was how he handled frustration.

Blaze stayed ready in case the gamble failed.

For the first time, the rogue sounded abandoned.

Jack said respect required discipline.

A higher rank could not come from a rampage.

The rogue admitted Shadowgarde called him unstable.

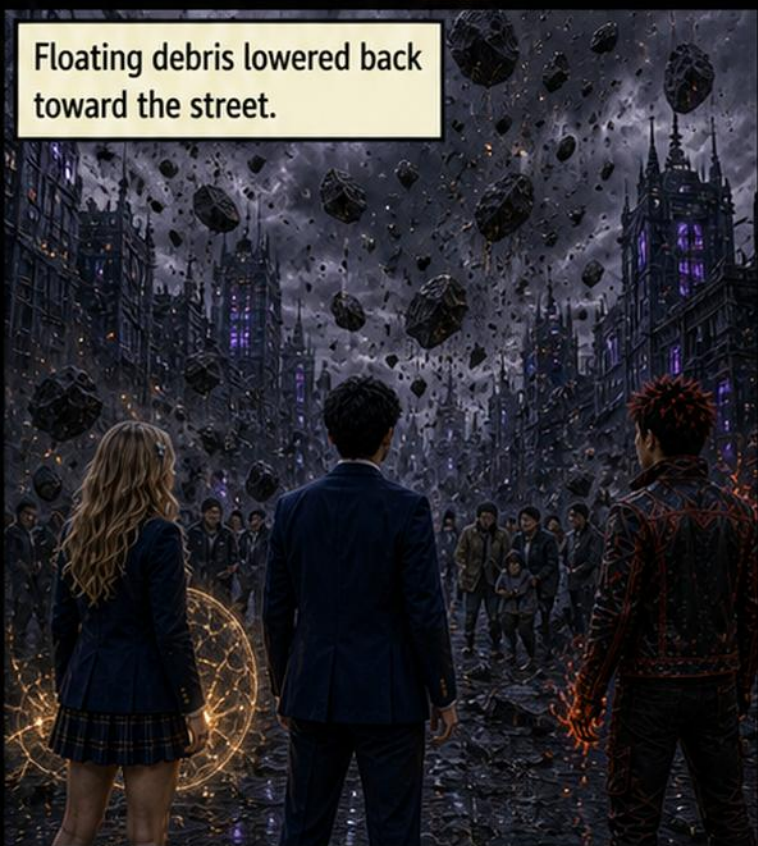

Aurora said surrender could be real strength.

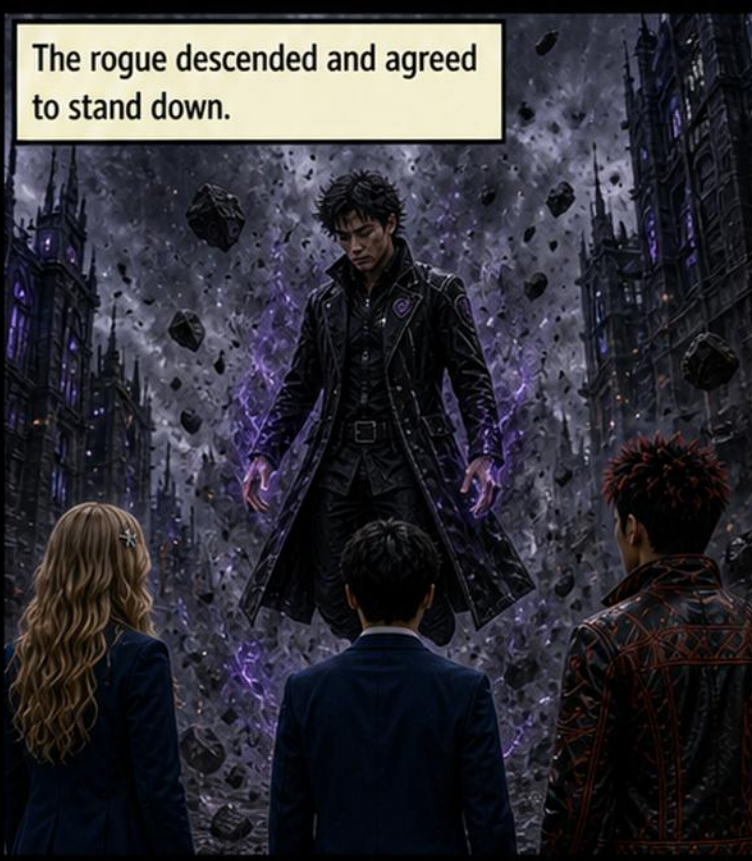

The gravity distortions began to settle.

Floating debris lowered back toward the street.

The rogue descended and agreed to stand down.

Shadowgarde enforcement arrived too late for credit.

The civilians were safe.

The mission ended without destroying the student.

Aurora called it redemption versus bureaucracy.

The Reality Breakers were no longer simulation students.
